Introduction

A competency is a description of professional competence. A competency is a body of knowledge, understanding, skills, attitudes, and personal qualities and is often clearly defined in terms of concrete behaviors. Each job requires a unique combination of skills. The ideal situation, for anyone, is to find work that closely aligns with their personality and competency development potential.

Your personality, work styles, values, and experiences all influence the extent to which you are predisposed to certain competencies. Competencies that are close to your personal characteristics are easier for you to develop. The behaviors associated with those competencies are probably already apparent in your day to day life.

Based on the questionnaires you have completed, we have created this report to give you an indication of how different competencies align with your personality.

Developability of Competencies

Based on your personality, values, and work styles, as measured by the psychometric tests you have completed, we have created an indication score for each of the competencies in our library. The indication score does not, can not give an absolute signal about whether a particular competency can be developed. This score is to show how difficult, or easy, that development work will be.

Explanation of Scores

- + This competency clearly aligns with your personal characteristics. This competency, and your ability to develop it further, will feel natural and 'right' to you.
- | With some effort and motivation, it will be possible for you to develop this competency, though it will not be something that gives you energy or motivates you.
- Your personal characteristics and this competency are in direct opposition with each other. Displaying behavior associated with this competency will cost you a lot of energy and effort. You should avoid positions that require this competency be highly developed or constantly needed.

The development and growth in any competency is dependent on two factors:

1. How complex/difficult it is to develop a particular competency.
2. Your motivation to develop the competency

Complexity of the Competency

Competencies can be divided into four quadrants by looking at the competency in two different ways.

1. The kind of thinking required (vertical axis)
2. The impact of external factors on this competency (horizontal axis)

Way of thinking

To what extent does this competency require a flexible way of thinking? Does it require that you look at many possible solutions and directions (divergent thinking) or does it require focus and drive toward a known goal (convergent thinking)? Divergent thinking skills are harder to develop than convergent thinking skills.

Influence of external factors

When external factors have a greater impact on a competency (for example, when interacting with other people), it is more difficult to develop that competency. Such competencies require outside help to develop and learn effectively (communication training, public speaking courses, etc).

Combining these two factors gives us quadrants of developability as shown in the figure below.

		Divergent thinking
Internal		Relatively Difficult	Difficult	External
		Relatively Easy	Intermediate Difficulty
		Convergent thinking

Motivation

Aside from your personal characteristics and the complexity of the competency itself, there is your personal motivation to consider. Competencies that you do not feel motivated to develop will be more challenging than competencies that you feel will help you achieve a personal goal. Do you have the time and energy available for developing that competency?

Competencies in the Quinn Model of Competing Values

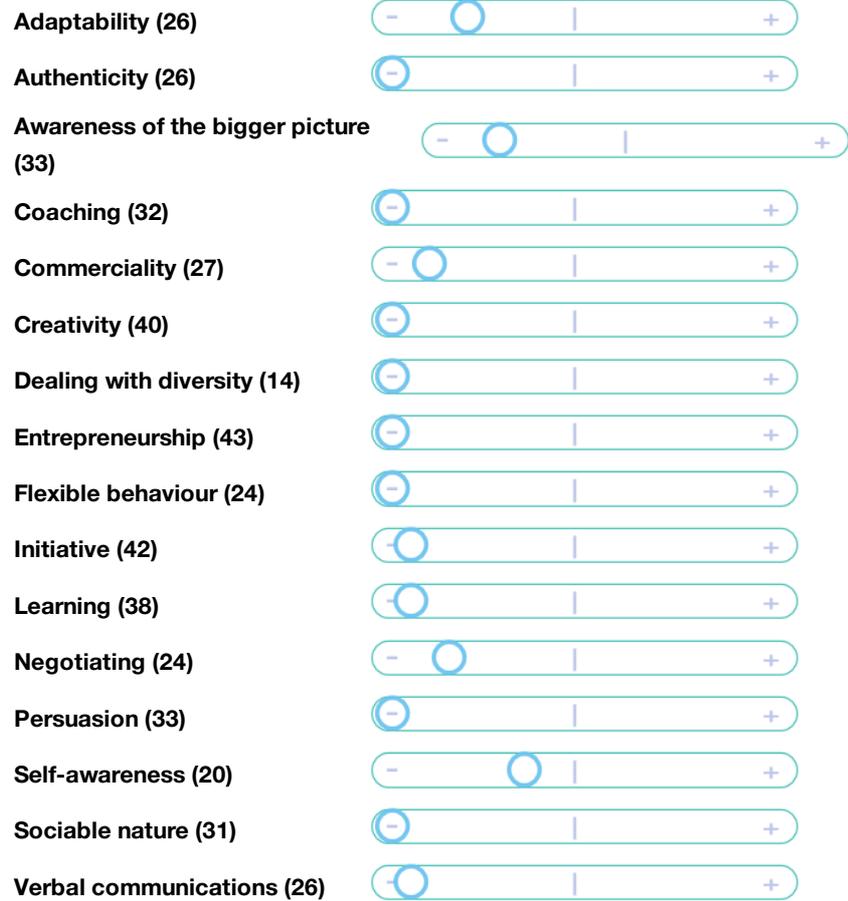

All of the competencies in our system have been related to the Octogram Model of workplace behavior. The Octogram, based on the Quinn Model of Competing Values, is the framework used throughout OTM to give all of our tests, and competencies, a common touch-stone of understanding. More information about the Octogram Model can be found on our web site www.onlinetalentmanager.com.
